Meet George. He isn't a knight, and he doesn't have a sword. He has something better: curiosity. George loves solving history's biggest mysteries.

Today, he is packing for his biggest adventure yet. He wants to find the truth behind the most famous monster-slayer of all time. Saint George.

"Everyone knows the story," George told his dog, Dragger, adjusting his favorite explorer's hat.

"A brave knight rides a white horse, kills a fire-breathing dragon, and saves a princess. But Dragger... did you know that Saint George never actually visited England?"

Dragger wasn't listening to the history lesson. If they were hunting a dragon, that meant there would be a giant dragon bone to chew on. Dragger packed a napkin. He was ready to feast.

From Lebanon, they traveled north to Turkey, specifically a region called Cappadocia. This is where the real man, George, was born around the year 280 AD.

"This has to be where the story is most famous," George said, scribbling in his notebook.

"Look at that building!"

George pointed to the famous Casa Batlló.

"The roof is shaped like the back of a dragon!"

Draggo's tail started wagging again.
The dragon was back in the story.
That meant the snacks had to be close.

George knelt down beside his friend and gave him a comforting scratch behind the ears.

"It's okay, Dragger," George said quietly.

Author's Note

In an ever-changing world where symbols and stories are so often used to mislead or divide, there is a profound need for our creative energy to be used as a bridge. If we all practiced the art of peace with the same fervor that some practice the art of war, the world would be a far kinder place.

As George discovers at the end of his quest, peace is not a final state to be reached; it is a work to be done. It is a daily practice of curiosity and empathy. One of the best ways to begin that work is by sharing our stories and acknowledging our differences to better understand our shared roots. By tracing the legend of Saint George across borders, from the kitchens of Beirut to the mountains of Ethiopia, we see that what connects us is far older and stronger than what keeps us apart.

While George searches for historical evidence, Drago offers a different kind of wisdom. A dog does not see borders, titles, or ancient grievances. They see only the person in front of them. He reminds us that even when we feel small, we are capable of immense kindness. Their presence is a call for us to look at our fellow man with that same uncomplicated grace and to rediscover the honesty that our loyal companions bring out in us every day.

On the dreams of dogs...

Their happiness is found so simply in a little care and consideration. Dogs like Drago understand the world through these honest essentials. A kind word, a shared meal, and a sense of belonging to the "pack." Perhaps we can find our own contentment by lowering our expectations of the world and remembering how to offer that same unconditional love.

They may be your best friend for a time, you are their best friend for all their lives.
